William and Charles Mayo, sons of a country doctor in Rochester, Minnesota, said they were “raised as doctors, as farm boys are raised to farm.” The Mayos believed in putting the needs of the patient first and practicing in a cooperative approach to medicine. Their early associates included a remarkable collection of men and women, including an order of Franciscan Sisters who built and managed the hospital that became the centerpiece of their practice. This documentary tells the story of “Dr. Will” and “Dr. Charlie,” and how their “clinic in the cornfield” became one of the world’s leading medical centers.
